Independent researcher claims to have discovered evidence of Moses in ancient inscriptions.

From Eliyahu

We all know who Moses is, and his story, because Moses is vital to the first five books of the Bible, called the Torah, which he wrote. In a very real way, the entire rest of the Scriptures are based upon that original foundation. It is little wonder then that Bible critics say Moses is just a myth and never actually existed. They have never hesitated to point out that his name has not been found on any inscription from ancient Egypt.

Even if true, that claim has never been much of a proof of anything, since Moses lived roughly four millennia ago, so that we should not expect that an inscription of the name of Moses, or any other specific person from so long ago, would still remain now. While we would not expect to find such an inscription, one has now been found anyway. It reads: "this is from Moses"!

Here is the report from the Jerusalem Post just yesterday, July 31, 2025:

Independent researcher claims to have discovered evidence of Moses in ancient inscriptions

The discovery, if confirmed, could provide the first archaeological evidence confirming the existence of the biblical Moses outside the texts of the Holy Scriptures.

Independent researcher, Michael S. Bar-Ron, reportedly made a discovery by deciphering a 3,800-year-old proto-Sinaitic inscription found in an Egyptian mine near Serabit el-Khadim. He claimed it reads "zot m'Moshe," meaning "this is from Moses." According to GEO France, this deciphering could provide archaeological evidence confirming the existence of the biblical Moses outside the Holy Scriptures, generating interest and debate among scholars and theologians.

The inscriptions were crafted in proto-Sinaitic script, an ancient writing system considered one of the oldest alphabets globally, dating to around 1800 BCE. This script is thought to be a precursor to Phoenician, Greek, and Latin scripts. GEO France reports other findings at the site included references to the deity El, an early name for the God of Israel, alongside inscriptions dedicated to the Egyptian goddess Baalati. These elements suggest cultural and religious conflict between Semitic workers and Egyptians, reflecting possible historical underpinnings of biblical narratives.

Serabit el-Khadim was an ancient turquoise mining location where proto-Sinaitic texts were found in the early 20th century. If Bar-Ron's interpretations are verified, it would amount to a discovery linking archaeological data with biblical texts. Over eight years, Bar-Ron used high-precision photographs and 3D scans of known inscriptions, specifically Sinai 357 and 361, which had been previously considered meaningless symbols, leading to what he attributes to Moses.

Nevertheless, Bar-Ron's claims have faced controversy. Egyptologist Thomas Schneider criticized the work, arguing it is "absolutely devoid of evidence and misleading" and cautioned that "arbitrary identification of letters can distort history." Clarín notes skepticism is compounded by the work not yet undergoing peer review in scientific journals, leading to skepticism about his conclusions. Egyptologists stress that the proto-Sinaitic script is extremely difficult to interpret, urging caution in accepting these claims outright.

Despite the criticism, Bar-Ron's academic supervisor, Dr. Pieter van der Veen from Johannes Gutenberg University Mainz, supported his interpretation. "He is absolutely right, I read that too. It's not imaginary," said van der Veen. Bar-Ron himself emphasized the consistency of letters, vocabulary, and style, suggesting that a high-ranking Semitic scribe, possibly within the educated caste of officials, might have been involved in creating the inscriptions.

The inscriptions, dated to the reign of Pharaoh Amenemhat III (1843 to 1797 BCE), suggest a religious and possibly social crisis. Some inscriptions mention religious struggles, such as damaged cult symbols and praises to El after symbols in the shape of fish were scratched out. Bar-Ron suggested this marks the "zero point of the theological rebellion," echoing a cultural conflict within the biblical stories.

Bar-Ron theorized about the existence of an educated and literate Jewish elite within Egyptian society, correlating to scriptural descriptions of figures like Joseph, as mentioned in the Book of Genesis. Such a social class might have faced eventual enslavement following a theological or social conflict.

An independent researcher has re-examined ancient Hebrew markings in Egypt ..He said it reads: 'This is from Moses'

A 2nd reference to Moses was found inside the mine

The researchers also identified text dedicated to ancient Egyptian gods that appeared scratched off and replaced with the Hebrew God

At this point in time there is no excuse for denying the existence of people recorded in the Bible. This same scenario has happened over and over again, and it always ends the same way. The critics say certain persons, objects or events reported in Scripture are myths and never existed, and then eventually documents will be found, inscriptions will be found, artifacts will be found, or some other evidence will emerge from the ancient past that confirm the Biblical record. There is nothing else, no other codex from the past stretching through millennia with a record of authenticity at all close to the incomparable body of sacred writings known to us as The Holy Bible. It stands alone as the immutable foundation of truth that is a literal gift from Heaven.

In the Bible we have a record of what the Creator said and did literally from the beginning of time, along with a record of His interactions through the ages with humans just like you and I. Moses is a prototype of every person who engages with Him, and with whom He engages Himself. His touch, His presence in their lives, take such people from the realm of the ordinary into the heights of whom they are meant to become. It is always a sort of partnership with God - or should I say with YHWH, Whose name means I Will Be Who I Will Be. With Him you must surrender. You will not be in charge, neither will you manipulate or control the One with such a Name.

He does what is good to Him, at all times, but He is not capricious. He always acts according to His Divine nature, all in perfect balance. Even so, He can be unpredictable to us, since His ways are so much higher than our own. This is why He makes covenants with His people. This gives us a ground of agreement with Him in which He has bound Himself to certain promises towards us, while He also expects us to respect Him by respecting the terms of our Covenant with Him in our own behavior. All His Ways are perfect, while ours are not. In the ultimate act of grace, He has even provided a solution for that.

YHWH is in control of history, which is why now, at the end of the age, we keep uncovering so many discoveries from the past confirming the Bible as a book of reliable History. However, the Bible goes beyond that in an amazing way. It reports history in advance. Often, very specifically. Invariably, though hundreds or even thousands of years may intervene, Bible prophecy cannot be broken. We can always be sure what has been uttered and recorded by the Spirit of God will certainly come to pass!

The parables of Yeshua are an excellent example of this. Some of them are prophetic and are written down for those who know Him, who have the wisdom from His Word and Spirit to understand what He has foretold. It's like this:

"The disciples came, and said to him, Why do you speak to them in parables? He answered them, To you it is given to know the mysteries of the Kingdom of Heaven, but it is not given to them." (Matthew 13:10-11)

Mysteries of the Kingdom are tucked away in the parables of Matthew 13. Are you one of His disciples? Then you should join us for a discussion of these parables that both foretell the future, and point the way through it.
